A boy of 12 years mistook a man for a deer at Guilford, Me., Saturday, and promptly shot him, finding out his mistake later. How long shall we continue to place guns in the hands of babes?

The worm has turned; the newspaper correspondent who obtained the Sir Lionel Carden interview, which the British foreign office repudiates, is ready to make affidavit as to the correctness of the published conversation. Moreover, he is backed up by the Associated Press correspondent, who was present at the time when the interview was given. And to cap the defense, the leading newspaper in Mexico City printed the interview, and it was not denied by Sir Lionel. There has been so much questioning of the correctness of statements by men, big and little, as printed in the newspapers, that it is gratifying to know here is an instance where the newspaper correspondents are ready to give oath that the words were spoke by the indiscreet Sir Lionel just as they appeared in cold type.

In a public speech, William Sulzer said: "I want to thank Judge Cullen and the members of the court who voted for my vindication." Just how Judge Cullen voted for Sulzer's "vindication" is shown by the following excerpt from his opinion when voting not to convict Sulzer: "His (Sulzer's) acts displayed such turpitude and delinquency that, if they had been committed during the respondent's incumbency of office, I think they would require his removal." In other words, the mere fact that Sulzer was not governor of New York when the acts were committed saved him from being voted against by Judge Cullen; and it deserves to be mentioned that Judge Cullen's opinion of Sulzer could not have been plainer. It is difficult to see how Sulzer can twist around Judge Cullen's act into anything like commendation. On the contrary, it was severe condemnation.

BARRE'S LECTURE COURSE.

In spite of rather discouraging support last season, the Barre Woman's club has again undertaken to furnish Barre and vicinity another entertainment course to be given during the fall and winter months, the course to consist of both lectures and concerts. The response thus far accorded the members of the club in the sale of tickets has been quite generous, but the support is still not what it should be for a series of entertainments of such unquestioned excellence and for a purpose which is so well directed as that of the Barre Woman's club. The quality of the entertainments provided by the committee in charge is such that each and every member of the series is bound to appeal to a great many people of Barre and surrounding towns, as none but the best has been secured. Therefore, those who attend are assured that they will be getting full value for their slight outlay of money. Aside from that, too, there is further incentive to attend because of the knowledge of the good work which the Barre Woman's club is doing in Barre. It is the intention of the club to use the proceeds of this entertainment course for the furtherance of the projects for local betterment which the club members have in mind. The entertainment course is not run for any private gain; everything above the expenses is to be turned back into the work of the club and under direction of that organization it is to be distributed among the various projects which are in view for next year in Barre.

Such being the situation, it is the privilege of the general public to assist in good work while at the same time they are getting the benefit of excellent attractions. They should bear in mind that the first number of the entertainment course comes to-morrow evening, when The Boston Octette appears at the Barre opera house. The advance sale of seats for the course should be augmented greatly by the single entertainment sales each evening of the five.

CURRENT COMMENT

Beef and the Tariff.

That department of the present administration that knows the most about beef gives the people of this country very little encouragement to hope that putting that staple on the free list under the new tariff will appreciably reduce its cost to the consumer. The experts of the agricultural department candidly confess that the cause of the present high prices of that article are too complex and compelling to be overcome by any such simple device as a removal of the duty. The real reason is that almost the whole world is short of beef. There is not enough to go around. Argentina, upon which many hopes have been rested because of the recent tentative shipments to this country, is steadily falling off in the production of cattle and whatever her surplus over domestic consumption may be, we shall find lively competitors for it in other foreign countries. Last year out of a total stock there of 29,000,000, over 7,000,000 cattle were killed. Australia's contribution to the world market is sheep rather than cattle. Canada, like ourselves, is raising fewer cattle every year, and Mexico, which from its nearness and extensive grazing facilities might seem the most promising of all potential sources, is not in a condition to have much effect upon the world's food supply.

Will then, the prophecy of one of the great packers that within 10 years' time sirloin steak would be bringing a dollar a pound be realized? That is not improbable if we depend upon the machinery of supply and demand as it is now running. The department's recent bulletin dealing with this subject says: "An important reason why farmers produce less meat than formerly is to be found in the system of distribution from producer to consumer that has grown up in this country. In most of the countries of Europe public abattoirs have been constructed to which farmers may consign their fat stock, the meat from which is then sold to the consumer without passing through the hands of an intermediate line of middlemen each of whom takes his toll."

The concentration and centralization of the industry have undoubtedly been among the factors that have turned the attention of the farmers of the East into other channels. That, also, is the reason why denatured alcohol has not proved as cheap and as serviceable as the public expected it would be when the tax was removed, and why efforts are being put forth to give the farmers greater opportunity by having individual or community stills under government supervision. The flour of the country, too, comes from the great milling centers and the old-fashioned grist mill which was a feature of every rural community has practically vanished. The distribution of beef is easier over these necessarily extended radii than is the collection of the material to distribute. That is why the packers are so worried and why they are appealing to the farmers to raise more cattle. But before this appeal is heeded, the eastern stock-raisers must be reasonably sure of a market. It would be poor economy to grow beef cattle here, send them to Chicago and have the slaughtered product returned to be disposed of through retail markets. The number of profits and processes this would entail would leave the price which the producer received far out of sight.

The agricultural department maintains that "public abattoirs with public sale of the meats of animals slaughtered at them, have become a crying need of this country." We believe such a system might be profitably established, but it would involve intelligent co-operation and that among the farmers of this section is something yet in its infancy. They are still on the individualistic basis and are rather reluctant to embrace the newer and more productive method. Necessity may bring them to it, though in the meantime they and the general public will pay rather dearly for learning the lesson.—Boston Transcript.

A Successful Woman's Start in Business.

In the October Woman's Home Companion a successful business woman tells how she made her start. She was a widow and was left with children to support. Her husband, Archie Haines, left a running business at the time of his death, which, if it had not been continued, would have netted very little real cash for the family to live on. Following is an extract from the story, showing how she made her start:

"My aimless walk had brought me to Archie's office. 'Oh, Mrs. Haines,' said Miss Blake, Archie's stenographer, 'something very important has come up, and your father's off buying wheat, and I can't reach him by wire or telephone. You know about the option on the Ross land out by the Falls. The Conroys, whose barrel factory burned down last week, have decided not to rebuild along the railroad tracks but outside the city limits. Everybody who owns a foot of ground is after them, but I think we have the best site of all. If only your father were here.'"

"Did Mr. Haines want to sell the Ross land for a factory? I asked. 'Yes. There's more land than the Conroys can use; but if we got one factory located out there, others would follow. And what Mr. Conroy would pay—'

"Why, Mabel Conroy and I went to school together. I know Mr. Conroy very well. If I sent you down there to see him, perhaps—"

"The upshot was that I went to see Mr. Conroy, armed with figures and arguments provided by Miss Blake. But I did not use these until the end of my interview. Mr. Conroy was so nice and fatherly that I caught myself telling him, not how desirable the Ross site was, but how much I wanted to manage my own affairs.

"I've got to support Archie's children," I said at the finish. "I can't turn them over to my father and mother. They're mine, and in years to come I want them to feel that I took their father's place as well as I could."

"Do you mean that you're going to keep Archie's office open?" Mr. Conroy asked.

"I can't tell yet; but I know that most of Archie's money is tied up in this option and I must get it out for the children. Here's the blue print and I've ordered a good rig to take us out. Will you go?"

"It was not a very business-like proceeding, but it turned out all right. When father returned, Mr. Conroy was ready to close the deal for 10 acres. I had learned the difference between a sale and an option, and several manufacturers had learned that the water-power on the Ross land was worth more than railroad sidings.

"That was the way my business career began."
